Towards the latter part of the afternoon, George came to see me again. He asked me what I meant by my treatment of him. He was earnest and anxious. I told him he must not question me in that manner. "But," he urged, "only tell me if you meant anything by it."

"Yes," said I, "I did." And he asked me what it was. I told him I meant to teach him a lesson.

"A lesson of what?" he asked. "Of good manners," said I. "I want to teach you not to be so attentive to me." And, I added, very thoughtlessly, " you annoy me!" He did not answer me. I saw his lips quiver, and his manly bosom heave, and, as he turned away, the sunbeams that came through the branches of the trees rested upon the big tears rolling down his cheeks. The impulse of my heart then was to spring forward and guess; and in future I hope he will make little less love detain him; and ask his forgiveness and make him happy, but a foolish, whimsical pride restrained me. I "My child," said Mrs. Burnet, with much feeling, let him go, and tried to comfort myself with the reflection that it would come out right.
